Dear Sir or Madam,

You may well find the CV a bit sketchy on the post-print career, and it has also been slightly mangled in an attempt to counter ATS. When the business sold and the new controller didn't want me anywhere near his train set we decided to prioritise my partners' pharmaceutical career. Over the next few years I got to spend way too much time with estate agents, but on the plus side a lot more time to exercise our large spotty dog.

In the intervals between long walks I upgraded certain tech skills, reviving old web projects in the belief that potentially remote opportunities in the tech field would afford a better work-life balance for someone with an active Dalmatian to entertain. This has proved to be a fool's errand as without commercial experience in web development my prospects of finding employment in that area would be somewhat remote, and if the adoption of AI continues at pace, job losses in this area could well rival those witnessed by the print industry.

Some of the tech skills pursued on my own initiative would have a positive impact when the business added a variable data offering to our print solutions but they were strictly extra-curricular to the core business of keeping the presses running and I can hardly ignore the rare opportunities that would play to my key strengths, chiefly the solid experience of print and finishing practices that informed the prepress tasks required for the successful fulfilment of print orders.

We had to say goodbye to our beloved dally in October. 13yrs, for those who care about such things, very much missed, but we're not in a position to look for a successor right now and therefore I have no constraints on seeking full time employment. Having been out of the game for a while I can't expect that remuneration would be on the higher end of the scale suggested and in that respect I hope my application would receive some due consideration.

Yours faithfully

Andrew Sykes
